The happy birds that wake the bow'rs With aweetest music after show'rs-Their song to me is hope and cheer The little white I linger here!

The mists above the meadows, The silver of the rills, And those dark waving shadows That tilt along the hills, Are silve. They're the unminted ore From which Fulth gets her metal pura, An inspiration ever sweet Attends the shadows at my feet.

I know that there is grandeur I know that there is grandeur
In yonder sweep of sky;
The muie and boundless ocean.
The mist-wreathed mountains night
There is a pow'r that guides my feet
From day to day. A something sweat
That whispers to my heart of joy,
And which no evil can destroy!

I tisten to the murmur Of winds in grasses green,
And in the lordly aspens—
Their sity'ry leaves between!
As one who waiks with Gladness, I

Great credit this manager took to himself for his keen discernment and his ability to bring to the surface real genlus wherever it existed and however deeply it might be baried in poverty, or even worse.

The camp learned the story by heart and, when the curtain was rung up on that memorable night, which proved to be both first and last of the performance, everyone looked for the little lady with the hollow cheeks and the large eyes, and they thought how fine a thing it would have been If she, he her time of her greatest need, could have been deinged with the golden treasure of a hight's winnings at the fare bank. The money meant so little to them, and it would have set everything right with her and her sick mather; and when they thought of the guardlan who was responsible for all of the wrong, their faces were not pleasant to look upon. "Little Lady's" part that night might have been taken from her own that my husband is a professional hulife, so real was the story of hardship morist? and self-abnegation, and her audience saw her only living as she had lived, of his jokes. suffering as she had suffered, before
